RE: Layth Al Yusuf

To Whom It May Concern:

Layth is a one of my current students in English and literature class. I consider him a friend and a son even beyond the classroom in high school.

I saw Layth grow from his old self to where he is today, and it was quite a journey. He started by having little to no motivation and suddenly started working in every minute of his free time to develop his knowledge in every single field, although business and communication were his bread and butter.

In my opinion, Layth's greatest talents are his intelligence and communication skills. He strive to help all his colleagues in their motivation to learn and tutor them, if needed. Although through my years of teaching most students tend to have a positive competitiveness nature that Layth has to an extent but he also goes the extra mile and takes a step back to help his colleagues. Layth displayed an unfathomable will to succeed in any area he steps into even though sometimes he would face obstacles that seemed impossible to overcome. He would split the problem into several small issues and take advice from his friends and teachers until he is able to solve them one by one. He takes the criticism to his own advantage. In addition, Layth takes pride in utilizing his teachers' experiences and often consults them in their areas of expertise. Layth's academic strengths are complemented by his demonstrated leadership skills.

I believe that Layth's charisma, dedication, passion, and ability to talk to anyone he meets with enthusiasm will act as the needed skills for him to be successful at you elite university. I am truly jealous that you are taking my best student in all the years I have been teaching, but I am sure he will change the world into a better place.

Sincerely,
